One reopening stock that Jim Cramer favored during Tuesday's Mad Money program was Norwegian Cruise Line Holdings Ltd. (NCLH) . Let's pack some bags and check on the charts on the way to the pier. In this daily bar chart of NCLH, below, we can see that prices have traded sideways since early March. This triangle-looking pattern looks ready for an upside breakout. Prices have crossed back and forth around the now rising 50-day moving average line. The 200-day moving average line has a positive slope. The On-Balance-Volume (OBV) line has been in an uptrend from early August telling us that buyers of NCLH have been more aggressive for months. The Moving Average Convergence Divergence (MACD) oscillator looks ready to move back above the zero line for an outright go long signal. In this weekly bar chart of NCLH, below, we can see a generally positive looking picture. Prices are in an uptrend above the rising 40-week moving average line. The weekly OBV line is bullish and leading the price action with its recent new high for the move up. The MACD oscillator is above the zero line and the two moving averages are right on top of each other. Renewed price strength could tip the indicator bullish again. In this daily Point and Figure chart of NCLH, below, we can see the triangle-like pattern to the trading. This chart is projecting a possible rally to the $37 area. In this weekly Point and Figure chart of NCLH, below, we used a five-box reversal filter and here a target of $43 is shown. Bottom line strategy: I am not much of a cruise person but traders could go long NCLH at current levels risking to $25. $37 and then $43 are the price targets for now. Ninthchamber asked the Printers forum about printing from an Android device. One usually doesn't associate printing with phones or tablets, in large part because once you have a portable device, you have less need for paper. But it still occasionally comes in handy. You can print directly from an Android device with the right Wi-Fi or Bluetooth printer. However, as I don't like to give advice that involves spending large sums of money, I'm going to tell you how to do it with whatever printer you already own. The only expenses will be paper and ink. Email your tech questions to [answer@pcworld.com or post them on the PCW Answer Line forum.] There is one caveat: The print job has to go through a computer that can already use that printer. If your PC isn't on when you tell your phone or tablet to print a document or photo, the actual printing won't happen until you next boot the computer. The whole trick depends on Google's free Cloud Print technology. This requires Chrome on your PC, and a Google account, such as you would need for Gmail or Google Docs. You have to be logged onto that account on both the phone and the PC. To set everything up on the computer, launch Chrome, and select Settings. At the bottom of the page, click Show advanced settings. Scroll down to the Google Cloud Print section. What options you'll see depends on other settings. Most likely you'll see an Add printers or a Manage print settings button. The first will add your installed printers to the list. The second will allow you to see what printers are there. To prepare your phone or tablet, download and install a Cloud Print-supported app; you'll find several on Google's Cloud Print App page. I tried the first, Paulo Fernandes' Cloud Print, and have no complaints. It's free, and it found my Google account on the phone without problems. (The Google page describes it as BETA, but neither Fernandes' page nor the app itself says anything of the kind.) After the easy setup, Cloud Print appears as an option any time you tap Share on a file or photo. Select it, then tap Click here to print. If your computer is on, it will print. If not, it will print later. Read the original forum discussion. It was a good thing that I arrived early for my day at Microsoft ("Can Microsoft Finally Kill All The Bugs?" Page 82), since I spent my first 20 minutes getting lost among its endless array of look-alike office complexes. At first, I was struck by the campus's apparent intimacy, with its low-rise buildings tucked among groves of towering Douglas firs. But after cruising through a Byzantine labyrinth of parking lots and side streets, I realized that I was at the epicenter of a place that was far larger than I had ever imagined. That's the way it is with the world's largest software company: Its gigantism sneaks up on you. Apparently, I'm not alone in that regard. Microsoft might be a $28 billion colossus, but some of its employees prefer to think of it as something akin to a startup. Consider the reaction that Scott Charney, Microsoft's recently minted chief security officer and the former computer-crime boss at the Department of Justice, encountered when he first arrived at Redmond, Washington. A Microsoft insider reports that many employees were incensed by Charney's appointment, arguing that he would burden them with bureaucracy. Charney was dumbfounded that a global organization of 50,000 people couldn't bring itself to acknowledge that it's a big — make that very big — company. Charney's rejoinder to his critics: Microsoft is already a bureaucracy, and the fact that it doesn't want to acknowledge that reality shows that it's a very bad bureaucracy. The upshot of the Charney story: Microsoft has grown to dominate high tech, but in terms of its culture, the Redmond giant is still working through its adolescence. Bill Breen: The Loneliness of a Long-distance Campaign Manager Joe Trippi, Howard Dean's campaign manager, readily confesses that his dream was not to be involved in politics at all this year ("Joe Trippi's Killer App," page 109). After stewarding a brutal congressional race in Pennsylvania in 2002, he had a simple plan for 2003: "A year of beaches, beautiful women, and pi — a coladas." So when his partners at his media consulting firm asked him to sit in on a meeting to discuss Dean's race, he couldn't have been less interested. Still, he came and was dismayed to discover himself responding to Dean's message. "As I'm watching him, I'm thinking, 'This guy really gets it.'" Then his left brain kicked in with a plea: "Are you out of your friggin' mind? They'll be carrying you away in a casket by June 30!" Passion trumped reason, and Trippi signed on. But the flesh is weaker than the heart, and by the end of an exhausting second quarter of manic fund-raising, Trippi's body sent him a message. Standing at the counter of a café, he actually fell asleep on his feet, hit the ground, and cracked a rib. Still, he's determined to soldier on. "This is the guy I've lusted for in my heart since I was 17. That's the only reason I'm here." Then he looks longingly at the framed photo of his placid farm in Maryland and reaches for a ringing telephone. Linda Tischler: Ship of Fools! should explain why Deb Meyerson, Steve Zuckerman, and their three children were vainly trying to anchor late one night off the Aegean coast ("These People Spent a Year on a Boat and Lived to Tell the Story," page 121). It wasn't their fault. It was Fast Company's Photographer Grant Delin and I, with my son Conor, met their boat, the Nowornot, a bit more than a week before the end of its voyage. Almost immediately, we sensed that we were upsetting a finely honed family rhythm. Grant was soon seasick, and I fell asleep mid-interview. Later that afternoon, we took Zuckerman and the kids ashore to photograph baseball practice near the beach. By the time we returned to the boat, night was starting to fall — and Meyerson was growing impatient. Rest assured, we did atone for our disruption, more or less. After dropping a line into the water at an inopportune moment, Grant gallantly jumped into the dinghy to help Adam Zuckerman secure the Nowornot to the rocks onshore. The anchorage ultimately failed, but we still enjoyed a pretty stunning night under the Turkish sky. Keith H. Hammonds: Tuesday marks the long-awaited introduction of the first phone running Google's Android software, but some experts warn phone users not to get their hopes up too high. T-Mobile's launch of the Dream — a phone made by HTC and the first on the market to run Google's Android software — likely won't be accompanied by the mad rush that surrounded Apple's introduction of the iPhone. "Any launch short of the iPhone launch is going to seem small, so I think it's incumbent upon us to recognize that it doesn't get like that very often," said Bill Hughes, an analyst at In Stat. In fact, the hysteria surrounding the iPhone launch is likely never to be replicated in the mobile-phone world, he said. Researchers from Strategy Analytics are predicting that 0.4 million Android phones will sell in the fourth quarter this year, making up 4 percent of the smartphone market share in the U.S. In comparison, Apple sold 1.12 million iPhones in the first quarter the phone was on the market, although the iPhone was for sale for a full three months and the Android phone will only likely sell for two months before the end of the year. While T-Mobile is planning a launch event on Tuesday, the phone is not expected to become available until as late as the end of October. Still, even if sales of the first Android device are lower than the iPhone, the Android phone is notable for a few reasons: It's Google's serious entry into the mobile-phone market, it accompanies a shift in the mobile-phone market toward openness and it adds yet another platform in an already crowded mobile operating system market. While Google already offers applications for mobile phones, designing an operating system allows it to more leeway in the types of applications it can offer. The company has complained about the difficulties working in the wireless industry, where operators often serve as gatekeepers to which applications users can download and use. Operators can also prevent applications that use certain phone capabilities, such as GPS (Global Positioning System) or VoIP (voice over Internet Protocol). With Android, Google can design and offer essentially any kind of application. "We expect Android will eventually offer a compelling range of mobile applications emphasizing Google's online assets, such as advertising, mapping and search," Neil Mawston, director at Strategy Analytics, wrote in a report released Friday. But because Android is one of many incompatible mobile operating systems, its emergence won't necessarily lead to an influx of new mobile applications. In addition to Android, developers are also interested in building applications for Symbian, Windows Mobile, BlackBerry, LiMo and the iPhone. None of those operating systems is compatible, so applications don't inherently work on phones running the different software. Developers simply don't have enough time to target all of the operating system. "The reality is that there are only so many applications developers at any given time with a finite set of resources," Hughes wrote in a recent report. "They're looking for the platform with the largest audience," said Eric John, director of marketing for Forum Nokia, in a recent interview. Symbian, which runs Nokia's smart phones, has the biggest market share of any operating system around the world, although only a small share in the U.S. Android does appear to have attracted a healthy group of developers, who will be able to distribute their applications in a store hosted by Google. But Android has also come under fire from some developers who claim that Google has not been forthcoming enough about the progress of updates to the software development kit. Some developers were also dismayed recently to discover that Google had offered the 50 winners of a contest an updated version of the software, while other developers continued to use a buggy, older version. While the volume and quality of applications may yet be uncertain, Android surely is notable as yet another open mobile operating system. Symbian recently announced that it will open source the operating system and the LiMo Foundation has developed an open Linux-based mobile platform. There is an "undeniable trend toward openness," said Andrew Shikar, director of global marketing for the LiMo Foundation. Perhaps, but it's unlikely that every platform, including those from Microsoft, Research In Motion and Apple, will open up. It's all relative anyway, said Hughes. "A cynic would say the open movement is more of a political slash marketing move than a profound shift," he said. "Probably, knowing the wireless industry in the U.S., it will end up more open than it was, but it's never going to live up to some people's ideals of what openness should be."
